Dr. Beth Hodges is an associate clinical professor at the University of North Carolina Chapel Hill School of Medicine. Hodges also operates a private practice in Asheboro, N.C., where she has specialized in preventative medicine, women’s health, geriatrics and hospice care since 1999.

Hodges has been treating people with fibromyalgia for over a decade. She is an advocate for increased education about fibromyalgia among patients and caregivers and has given talks across North Carolina to educate fellow healthcare professionals about diagnosing and treating the condition.

Hodges is a member of the American Academy of Family Practice and North Carolina Medical Society. She regularly publishes academic works, including “Fibromyalgia: Overview, Exercise, and Treatment,” an e-publication released in 2010. Other recent publications include, “Hospitalists: Why I Don’t Use Them,” “Why We Welcome Hispanic Patients,” and “Nurses: A Physician’s Perspective.”
